Chapter VI
The Victory over the Buddhists in Debate

414

A great ascetic, one who was indissolubly bound to the holy feet of the Lord with the long, trailing locks, conceived in his mind the desire to survey the riches of and ascertain the truth about the ocean-girt earth. Accordingly, having visited the Chola kingdom and worshipped in Tillai’s shrine, he arrived on his voyage of discovery in the flawless land of Ilam.¹

415

That most excellent of holy sages reached the royal seat of the king who ruled over the richly endowed land of Ilam, and there, out of the deep devotion which suffused his mind and heart, he began wherever he went to proclaim the following message: ‘May the Golden Hall of Tillai flourish throughout endless time.’

416

During those days when the sage was going about proclaiming wherever he went the glory of the noble Hall of purest gold, some ignorant men, quite lacking in all good qualities, came before the king of Ilam and, prostrating themselves before him with great devotion, gleefully addressed him as follows: ‘Hear, our king, this news, which we have brought to you.’

417

One endowed with unswerving rectitude has come to this city. Adorned with fine jewels and rudraksha beads, he lives from day to day by begging for alms. Whether he’s standing or sitting or lying, he never ceases to proclaim the greatness of the effulgent ‘Hall of Gold’. They finished speaking and stood there before the king.

¹ Sri Lanka, which was a Buddhist kingdom.
When the king commanded, ‘Bring him before me this very day,’ y they went to where he was and said to him:
‘Great devotee, our powerful monarch has summoned you!
Please come with us.’
To which the sage replied:
‘What business can your great king have with one who,
free of all blame and praise,
has no other thought in his mind than to live from day to day, begging for alms?’

They in turn insisted, saying: ‘It is the desire of every great king to watch over the lives of all those who dwell within his realm, even of those who live by begging and who have no further involvement in the affairs of the world.
Therefore, you must come to our king who wears a fragrant flower-garland.’ Thereupon that sage whom no evil marred went along in the company of those heralds with their brightly glinting spears.

The king whose shoulders were fine and strong was seated on his royal throne, surrounded by his army, and at his side stood a Buddhist sage who was versed in the three great pitakas, was free of the four defects,
was endowed with the five ancient virtues, possessed the ability to restrain the thirty paramitas, and upheld the doctrine that liberation consisted in the dissolution of the five skandhas.

2 Three Pitakas or baskets of the Southern Buddhist Canon. They have been estimated by English translators to be eleven times the size of the Christian Bible.
3 The five aggregates (skandhas) are the scheme the Buddha chose to describe the nature of the individual human existence. The five aggregates are: the material organism (rupa); sensation (vedana); conception (sajjia); volition (samskara); and consciousness (vijiana).
Calling out an invocation to the Golden Hall,
the holy ascetic came and stood near to the king, who trembled with fear
as he beheld his matchless white loin-cloth, his staff and bright begging pouch, the long cane decorated with bells that he held in his hand, his holy countenance adorned with a vivid vermilion mark, the matted locks piled up high,
which trembled as he moved,
and the hint of a smile that played about his lips.

Turning to the great sage who stood there before him, that ruler whose dominion encompassed the earth enquired of him:
‘What is the true meaning of the phrase
‘Sacred Hall’ which you repeat?’
To which he replied: ‘In the land ruled by the illustrious Chola king, who protects it with the abounding grace of his steadfast gaze, there is a holy place which fosters righteousness, and the name of it is “Chidambaram”.

‘Before it stands the sacred grove of Tillai.
It shines out as the foremost holy place in all the worlds and it is known therefore as the primordial shrine.
It is accessible to all,
and bears the noble title of “Centre of the Earth”.
Here it is that the Supreme Lord performs His cosmic dance under the gaze of His consort, Uma, whose breasts are smeared with a paste of sandalwood.

‘In that place there is a blessed holy tank which cured the leprosy of Singavanman, that son of Manu whose strength is ever unfailing, and which endowed him with a form like that of great golden Mount Meru.
Those who bathe there and then witness the holy dance in which the Lord performs the five sacred operations, even if they have never before upon this earth performed a single act of devotion, they shall be freed henceforth from the worldly cycle of births.
"This is the place where, to prove His mastery over the highly esteemed gods of other faiths, the Lord, wearing beautiful anklets of pure gold,
and displaying His standard emblazoned with the Bull, triumphantly performs His cosmic dance as His consort Uma looks on, thereby freeing men’s souls from the pressing toils of birth and bestowing upon them the good gift of final liberation.

Even those who are wicked in word and deed, whose evil minds do not contemplate the two holy feet of the Lord who bears the flooding Ganges in his matted locks, if they call but once upon the Golden Hall, it will be as if they had repeated 21,600 times the sacred five-lettered mantra which bestows liberation.’
Thus spoke the one whose glory was without bounds.

‘King, you who know nothing of the sacred ash and the Five Holy Letters, such is the import of the phrase ‘Holy Golden Hall’ which I am reciting,’ said he whose inner qualities were great and abiding like mountains.
At this the Buddhist sage, growing angry, cried out:
‘Can there be any god other than the supreme one whose teaching is enshrined in the three pitakas?

'I myself shall depart and journey to the place called Tillai and there, engaging in scholarly debate, I shall destroy the power of the anklets which adorn that God’s dancing feet, and tear down His tall ensign, emblazoned with the Bull.
Proving for all the world to know that the Lord Buddha,
he who sits in the bodhi tree’s shade,
is the one true God,
I shall offer that same Golden Hall to him as his own abode.
'This task I shall accomplish within three days,' he said, rising to his feet and mounting his beautiful palanquin. Then, surrounded by the host of his disciples who worshipped his holy feet, he crossed the ocean whose waves cast up abundant shells of the conch, traversed forests and cities, and came swiftly to the City of the Tiger, goaded on by the distress that filled his mind.

The king, hoping to cure the dumbness of his daughter who was dearer to him than all his wealth, reflected to himself that it was fitting that he too should journey to the Golden Hall. Surrounded by his army, he mounted his matchless great palanquin and travelling into the Chola land, entered the precincts of Chidambaram.

Meanwhile, even as he prepared to depart, the Buddhist sage arrived within the precincts of Tillai’s great city, abode of Him whose ruddy hand grasps the cosmic flame. There, alighting from his palanquin, he entered the beautiful temple of the Lord of Chidambaram, He who wears in his matted locks the cool, swelling flood of the Ganges, and came into a hall which was lavishly decorated with ornaments of pure gold.

While he remained there, the king arrived, prostrated himself before his guru and praised him, his heart overflowing with joy. Noticing their arrival, all those who performed holy service in the temple to the Lord in whose matted locks a nest of serpents writhe, banded together and converged upon them.
Deeply wounded as they were, each of them, in mind and heart, their anger flared forth like fire and they spoke a few curt words that filled the Buddhist throng with dread: ‘Buddhist sage, go at once and leave the bounds of Tillai’s city. This we shall not tolerate!’

The Buddhist sage stood up before the Chola king, who wears a garland of flowers, and taking up his religious tract, affirmed: ‘The Saiva faith which you uphold is worthless. We shall not leave until we have proved conclusively, here and now, that the exalted Lord Buddha is the one Supreme God.’

After hearing the Buddhist speak in this manner those who were present departed swiftly, saying: ‘We must inform everyone of this state of affairs.’ Going from house to house they conveyed the news to those citizens of Chidambaram who were practised in religious austerities, to those who were pre-eminent in their knowledge of the Vedas, and to those who were employed in the holy service of the Lord.

Upon hearing the report of that speech which was like a spear probing a wound in their flesh, they converged all together upon the temple of the Lord, saying as they hurried along: ‘We shall assemble in the beautiful jewelled Hall and hear the arguments of this Buddhist who has arrived.’

Seeing as they approached that the Buddhist, devoid as he was of true knowledge, did not advance to greet them, they rebuked him angrily, saying: ‘You who are quite ignorant of the path of your own salvation! How is it that you show no reverence, but remain seated there in this disrespectful manner?’
‘On the authority of your Vedas with their subsidiary branches, your Agamas and your Puranas, you claim that yours alone is the one true God. Likewise do I make the same claim for the God I worship. Therefore state your beliefs before me.’ said the Buddhist guru.

Those brahmins, learned in the Vedas which all men praise, grew angry saying: ‘We shall overwhelm you in debate, and our learned scholars shall proclaim aloud your discomfiture. Meanwhile, what would be the point of speaking further with you? It would be like throwing a large stone into a muddy pond.

‘When an enraged dog is barking, even great men who perform good deeds are bound by duty to stop and calm its fury. Similarly, even though we demean ourselves through our contact with one so base as you, yet we do not demur to refute your empty claims in debate.

‘If the debate takes place before the assembled company of all-powerful kings, and those learned men whose judgement is true, they will be able to decide which arguments are true, and which false. This is the course of action we should adopt, since it would leave no room for any confusion.’

The wise men of Tillai whose penances were true wrote a message to the king explaining the situation: that the citizens of Chidambaram, being unable to counter the Buddhist’s arguments, would become angry and beat him, thereby incurring the censure of the world.
Accordingly many letters were sent out containing joyous tidings and inviting brahmins, holy ascetics and learned professors to assemble in the Golden Hall on the next day for divine worship. Meanwhile, the sun set and the moon rose up in its turn.

Like the spot on the bright forehead of the maid who rules the lofty heavens, like the bright mirror wherein the maiden Night admires her reflection, like the pearl-studded umbrella which shades the Lord whose long ear-rings are embellished with conch-shells, the great Moon God appeared gloriously adorning the entire earth.

‘Buddhist, remain here just one day more’, they told him, and tomorrow we shall expose your baseness to the world.’ So saying, all those noble men departed for the night, ate a good meal, and slept deeply inside their fine houses.

Meanwhile, before the sun rose up the Lord who dances in the beautiful Hall adopted the pleasing form of a holy ascetic, staff in hand, His body smeared with sacred ash, and His luxuriant matted locks piled high on His head. In this guise He appeared to all those brahmins of Tillai, and spoke to them thus in their dreams:

‘Do not be distressed, for on the outskirts of our city the sage Vadavurar dwells, seated in loving contemplation of the Lord. As soon as he hears this message he will come, and, employing appropriate works of doctrine, will defeat the Buddhist in debate. Therefore go immediately and summon him hither, you who are dignified by your austere penances!’
After dreaming this dream they awoke and realised upon careful consideration that these were the words of the Lord of the Golden Hall, He who shares His form with Her whose arms are adorned with bright bangles.
Whereupon they were filled with joy,
and joining their fair hands above their heads, they all came and gathered in the assembly hall of the temple.

Whereas formerly they had been greatly distressed by the claims of the ignorant Buddhist, their features were now radiant with joy at the words which the Lord, out of His infinite compassion had come to impart to them in that momentous dream.
They were like lotus blossoms tightly closed in night’s powerful grip subsequently unfolding themselves to the rays of the rising sun.

They all spoke at once, telling each other how under the spreading cloak of darkness
The Lord who performs His holy dance in the Sacred Hall had appeared to them in a dream, grasping the fair staff of a holy mendicant with ruddy matted locks and ash-besmeared body, and how to their great joy,
He had imparted to them a certain message.

As they spoke with wonderment of the Great Father, the Lord who dances in the Sacred Hall, devotion grew stronger in each one’s heart,
and putting aside their former sadness, they hurried off to that noble palm-leaf hut,
thinking to themselves, ‘We must go quickly to the place where the true ascetic Vadavur abides!’
Reaching this palm-leaf hut they lovingly sought out that mountain of divine grace, Vadavurar, and rejoiced as they beheld him seated majestically in the lotus posture. When he had arisen from his yogic contemplation they repeated to him, marvelling, everything that the Lord who dances in the Sacred Hall had told them.

When the import of their words dawned on his understanding, Vadavurar, mindful of the instructions which he had formerly received from Tillai’s Lord, returned swiftly to the city, accompanied by those who had come to summon him. Having first worshipped the Lord of the Sacred Hall and obtained His blessings, he repaired to the jewelled Hall where sat the Buddhist whose understanding was bewildered and confused. Saying: ‘Merely to look upon his evil face would be a sin,’ he ordered a curtain to be erected masking him from view and finally seated himself upon a gorgeous throne, facing his opponent.

The king of the fertile Chola land came hurrying, surrounded by brahmins versed in the scriptures’ eternal lore, puranic experts, and wise men learned in the exacting disciplines of the arts and sciences. Paying homage at the shrine of Tillai’s Lord, he departed from there and came to the Hall adorned with glittering gems. Having praised the blessed devotee Vadavurar, and worshipped his holy feet, he seated himself on a beautiful couch close at his side, resembling in his royal state the moon at the full, when it displays all its sixteen phases.
The king of the rich land of Ilam arose and paid homage to the Chola King, presented to him the remainder of his tribute, and stood there crying out, ‘Great sovereign, long may your rule prosper!’
The noble Chola King, joyfully replied to him saying: ‘These are indeed fine elephants. And these jewels are truly beyond price!’
Then, when he had respectfully placed the foreign king at his side, and settled himself in the midst of that crowded assembly, those whose task it was to deliver the important judgement seated themselves in close attendance about him.

After the brahmins and holy ascetics of Chidambaram were comfortably seated in fine array, the celestials too foregathered in that great assembly to witness the debate between the sage Vadavurar, who was learned in the weighty texts of the Agamas, and the Buddhist, in whom all virtuous qualities were lacking. Vishnu, Rudra and Brahma, bestower of the ancient Vedas, all were there, along with the seven rishis and the guardian deities of the eight directions, along with the heavenly choir, and the sun and moon, who illuminate day and night with their rays.

Seated in the midst of his great army, The king of the land where the cool, golden Kaviri river flows made obeisance to the holy feet of him whose home was in the land where southern Perunturai lies. Then, standing before him, he addressed him thus: ‘To defend the Saiva faith, and establish its true wisdom, that shall be your task, whilst mine, afterwards, will be to destroy the lives of those Buddhists in this very place!’

Upon hearing the words of the Chola king, which struck terror into the hearts of those treacherous Buddhist visitors, Vadavur exultantly addressed their leader, saying: ‘You whose words are full of deceit! Explain the reason why you have come here!’ These words pierced the attentive ears of the Buddhist like darts, and he replied as follows:
'Affirming that there is no God other our Eternal Lord, we have come to this great shrine with the intent of installing our Lord Buddha within the Golden Hall for all to see. It is for this purpose that I came here yesterday, and I entertain no object other than that.'

In reply, our Lord Vadavurar smiled and said: ‘You who are without the merit of former penances! Tell me, can a mouse suddenly turn into an elephant? Very good then, but leaving that aside, pray speak to us of your good and great God, and the deeds which a man must do to reach the shelter of his holy feet!’

The Buddhist replied angrily to the words of the noble sage, saying: ‘Is it possible to show the light of the sun’s rays to one who has no eyes to see? To speak the great glory of our transcendent Lord would require countless thousands of virtuous tongues!’ Then he continued as follows:

‘Our Lord is he who gave forth the three glorious repositories of all moral truth. Out of his love for all forms of life, he took noble birth for their benefit in many a womb. then, having purged himself of the taint of killing and the other three cardinal sins, he seated himself in meditation in the shade of a splendid bodhi tree.

The suffering of birth stems from the indestructible and manifold awareness which continually arises and disappears. This awareness itself arises through the conjunction of the five skandhas which are form, which each creature adopts in the womb, sensation, volition, conception, and consciousness. Just so, liberation consists in the dissolution and annihilation of these.’
Vadavurar fixed his gracious, holy gaze upon the flawless countenance of the Lord of the land where the abundant waters of the Kaviri River flow, and thought to himself:
‘What might I say to this foolish Buddhist who, adopting these erroneous views, speaks such arrant nonsense?’
At length, he replied with these words:

‘On the one hand, you claim that your Lord and Master gave forth holy works which proclaim the moral laws; on the other, you assert that the evolving consciousness continually arises and disappears in the twinkling of an eye.
How then, can you affirm that your Lord composed the dark, delusive pitakas, when his very consciousness must necessarily subside before he has time to promulgate his subject matter and the manner of its expression, and speak it out?

‘Thus it is established, that your faith cannot possess any books of sacred law.
Furthermore, you claim that your God took birth from many and varied wombs for the benefit of living beings.
But how can the delusion of an evil doer be dispelled by one who possesses the very same delusive awareness which he came to eradicate!

‘You affirmed that your king would never contemplate the taking of life, yet during the time that he took birth upon your earth in so many successive incarnations he must have taken the form of such creatures as the fierce powerful tiger and the jackal, and suffered the fierce pangs of hunger.
Did your great Lord of the bodhi tree confine himself to a diet of grasses and green leaves then?'
Unthinking fool! In your fraudulent scriptures, you say that form is annihilated along with the five skandhas. Where, then, is the form which your Lord possesses? And how can he be said to pass from womb to womb, assuming successive embodiments out his desire to confer his grace upon living beings?

Moreover, since soul and body, which combine together as cause and effect, are both in essence non-existent, then the embodied form our your Lord, who sits in the shade of a majestic bodhi tree, is equally non-existent. Fool, bereft of all wisdom! Who was there, then, to compose the text of your pitakas which, through their absence of any true wisdom, claim that liberation is merely total annihilation?

You speak of Buddhas, twenty-one in number, each of whom, as he was born, tore open the body of his noble mother? Can they really then be gods, who commit the foul curse of destroying the life of the parent who lovingly bore them, and who deserve to be cast into the bottomless pit of Hell?

In your falsehood-ridden works, you say that in the embodied form there is no soul principle existing separately from the combination of the four delusive elements. Senseless one! When a snake crawls across your face in the middle of the night when you are sleeping, will not the distinction became clear to you then?
'Your religion does not admit that consciousness arises from the combination of spirit and material form. But since it is admitted that, upon the decay of the material form, the life-force departs swiftly, to combine with another form and undergo rebirth, then you must frankly avow the existence of form and spirit as separate entities.

'Quoting your sacred pitakas, you babble on, saying that the fifth element, ether does not exist, and is therefore not the medium of sound. The ether, you say, is a false postulate, not realising that it provides the space necessary for the combination of the elements earth, water, fire and air. Pray explain the origin of the sounds you utter which must necessarily be borne upon the ether!

Whilst you deny the reality of the directions which possess great extension in space, it is you who perform obeisance to that bodhi tree which is situated in the distant north. If you repeated those arguments to an assembly of the ignorant, insane and dishonest of this world, then indeed your claims might find acceptance.

'You say that trees have no soul, yet they are not different from us men, whose bodies are compounded out of the five eternal elements. Taking, fresh water as their nourishment, they grow up and spread their branches. Without this food they are reduced to dried-out husks. Therefore you will accept that the tree is one of the forms of the diverse chain of births through which our Lord decreed that the precious souls of men should be made to experience the fruits of their former deeds.
‘Knowing that murder is a great and heinous sin, yet you proclaim in your book of lies that it is permissible upon this earth to eat putrid flesh which has been slaughtered by others.
Is it acceptable then that those who tempt you with offers of fresh meat, severing the union of body and soul to satisfy your hunger, should thus incur that sin on your behalf?’

‘Those who are versed in the holy Agamas, handed down by Lord Siva himself, whom the Vedas praise,
state that salvation consists in the destruction not of the causal principle, the soul, but of the manifest effect, the body.
You, however, demon-possessed as you are,
being unaware of these distinctions, affirmed that liberation entailed the destruction of the perfected soul along with the body.

‘You claimed that liberation occurred upon the annihilation of the five skandhas, But if we inquire who they are
who have gained liberation in this fashion, we see that, since their consciousness arises along with these skandhas, it must disappear along with them upon their dissolution.
Thus there can be no liberation.’

The Buddhist, furious that the glorious lustre of his name should be thus eclipsed, angrily cried: ‘Since you deny the existence of our God and of our path to salvation, pray tell us of your God
and your concept of final deliverance.’
Whereupon the Saiva sage replied, out of his deep understanding of the Lord, the abiding knowledge of Lord Siva:
‘Can it be an easy matter to tell the great glory of Him who silently taught the holy law, seated in the shade of a beautiful banyan tree; who shines within the Golden Hall, as many devotees behold and worship His divine form; whose body is besmeared with sacred ash; who shares His form with the Goddess Uma, and whose nature is suffused with divine grace?

‘Are there any words which can convey the measure of our King who dwells in Tillai’s beautiful hall,’ said Vadavurar, breaking off from the speech which he graciously uttered, and remaining silent, as in his mind he considered many a verbal formula. At this the contemptible Buddhist bade him answer the question, saying:

‘Previously you gave me to believe that your God was one who dispersed the divine law seated in the shade of a banyan tree. Could it be that, as he counts off His holy beads, He wonders whether there is not some superior deity who is beyond the reach of His meditation?

‘Again, you stated that this Lord of Tillai performed His cosmic dance as those who dwell upon this great earth look on in worship. Is His dancing, then, for the benefit of a select company of the wise of this world, or merely to satisfy His own whim!

‘You stated that your Lord who dances in the Golden Hall for the whole world’s salvation, adorns His body with ashes. Can it be that your ancient God does so in the belief that even ashes will look pure against the ruddy glow of His divine form?'
'You put forward as a reason for His greatness the fact that your Lord shares His form with the Goddess Uma.
Has anyone ever heard of any creature upon this earth which is half woman in its form!
And would it not be futile to take up the life of renunciation when half of the body of the God you worship is female in form?'

In reply, He who had come upon the earth that the devotees of the Lord of the Golden Hall might attain to the higher life, gave a deprecating smile and said:
‘As one who has performed no meritorious penances, it is not fitting
that you should receive this worthy teaching.

'However, you should know that the Lord seated Himself thus,
with a string of sacred beads in His hand,
so that the whole world might, through His example,
come to practise the highest religious disciplines.
That rosary might be compared to the hand-sword with which a skilled master-at-arms instructs his pupils in the art of hand-to-hand combat.

'You accused our Lord of performing His dance before fleshly eyes, like those vulgar performers who have accumulated no store of spiritual discipline.
Rather should you reflect that, like the flame which, in consuming firewood, remains itself unchanged,
our Lord, as He dances, permeates the physical body,
and animates every soul.

'As to why our Lord smears Himself with sacred ash, you should reflect that He does so in order to alleviate the suffering of men’s souls.
It is like a medicine which a nursing mother swallows to ease the bitter pain that torments her new-born child.
'Buddhist! You whose lying words are based upon your perverted understanding!
Stop and tell me if there is anyone else who wears the sacred ash after the manner of our Lord.
The full truth concerning the good and holy ash is expressed by the four Vedas.
Can it be an easy matter, then, for any man to explain it?

'To answer your claim that it was a great sin
for Goddess Parvati to be seated at our Lord’s side, He seated Himself thus in the company of His consort, whose tresses are like clouds floating in the heavens, in order that He might afford to men of the world the necessary enjoyment of sensual pleasures.
The form of an accomplished ascetic,
He adopted for the benefit of the souls most advanced in Siva yoga.

'Like a blind man whose awareness extends no further than the staff which he grasps in his hand, your understanding cannot penetrate beyond the empty formulas you have learned to utter.
Blind as you are, you have failed to perceive how the Lord who bestrides as His mount a strong and beautiful Bull, pervades all creation as perfume pervades a flower.

'He is the Primal One, the Yogic Adept and the Universal Enjoier;
He is the formless effulgence, the wearer of manifold forms and the ocean of bliss.
From His crown to His feet, who can say they know Him save as the One who dwells within the Golden Hall, where virtue reigns and sorrow never enters.'
He who was versed in all the profound and eternal branches of knowledge then grew angry with the eminent patroness of all the arts, and cried out: ‘Goddess Saraswati, You who endow men and women with the gift of speech! How can you allow to be spoken such falsehoods as these?

‘Patroness of all learning, who spoke forth the entire collection of the Vedas! Why do you now speak such untruths? Have you forgotten now how Virabhadra tore off your nose at Dakshan’s sacrifice? Leave the tongue of this foolish Buddhist at once, he who denies the existence of the gracious rule of the Three-Eyed-One, and submit yourself to the authority of Lord Siva!’

Hearing this, Goddess of Speech trembled with fear. In fear at these words, Saraswati departed from the tongues of those deceitful Buddhists, so that they were immediately struck dumb. They cowered and trembled with fear, as though they had swallowed poison. Deeply troubled in his heart, the king of Ilam, after due reflection, fell in worship at the feet of him who was possessed of all the knowledge, without exception, contained in the holy Saiva Agamas, and coming to his feet, addressed him thus:

4 Saraswati, along with the other gods, attended Dakshan’s sacrifice, even though he had not invited Siva and his consort Sati, who was Dakshan’s daughter. Sati, however, decided to attend, was insulted by Dakshan and his wife, and in mortification threw herself into the flames and died. Siva dispatched the demon Virabhadra with an army of demons, to destroy the sacrifice. Saraswati’s punishment was to have her nose cut off.
497

‘Those who could speak have been rendered dumb.
My daughter suffers from dumbness, and has never spoken.
Were that dumbness to disappear,
and the gift of clear speech to be granted her,
then should I become your own true devotee!
In reply the Lord Vadavurar said: ‘Bring her here without delay!’
Whereupon that young maiden entered that just assembly, where the truth had been upheld.

498

The virtuous sage turned to the young maiden, who, approaching, stood there before him,
and having bestowed upon her his sweet glance of grace, he called her forward and placed her before the assembly saying: ‘Slender maiden, whose locks are cool and fragrant!
You shall deliver a clear refutation of all the arguments put forward by those Buddhists who now stand by, quaking inwardly with fear.’

499

Like a scholar of great learning and attainment, that young maiden stood her ground and fully answered all the points of debate raised by those Buddhists, who had failed to grasp the nature of worldly attachment.
Great delighted by this, the true hearted Vadavurar, taking this discourse as his subject matter, composed the ‘Holy Caral’\(^5\) in which the verses are fitted to a lively female game.

500

The king of Ilam himself, after he had recited the five holy letters and adorned himself with sacred ash, placed himself reverentially before the sage and became his devotee, lacking none of the qualities which befit a true disciple.
The Chola king, too cried out:
‘Praise be to the Golden Hall, eternal abode of the Ancient One!’
and preceded to lavish praises upon the glorious victor Vadavurar.

\(^5\) Hymn 12, The Tambour Song.
After he had stood before the eminent Saiva, donned a necklace of rudraksha beads and smeared his body with holy ash to become his devotee, that noble monarch of the land of Ilam humbly beseeched him to remove the fearful affliction of dumbness from the Buddhist throng, who, to their sorrow, clothed their bodies in ochre cloth, dyed with the gall nut.

When the citizens of Chidambaram and the king of the fertile land encircled by the Kaviri river lovingly paid homage to the sage, saying: ‘Great Master! We beg you to comply at once with this request,’ Vadavurar, whose glory was everlasting, joyfully bestowed his gracious glance upon the Buddhists, whereupon their dumbness was cured,
and, making obeisance before him,
they spoke as follows:

‘You whose mind is unsullied by any taint!
Through the abiding evil of our deeds in former births,
we did not adorn ourselves with taint-free white ash, nor did we recite the good Five Letters.
But we implore you now to bestow upon us, robes of red-ochre, the holy ash, with which to smear our bodies,
and rudraksha beads to place about our necks,
and to burn up these saffron robes!’
So saying they made numerous prostrations before him.

He who was unwavering in his rectitude permitted himself a smile as he reflected:
‘These are men who have accumulated a great store of penances in former births!’
and proceeded to adorn them with the dazzling lustre of sacred ash, and to garland them with rudraksha beads glorious instruments of spirited practice.
Then he took their saffron robes and fed them there and then into the tall billowing flames of a bonfire.
Accompanied by the citizens of Chidambaram, and by the king of the land where the pure waters of the Kaviri flow, by the ruler of the land of Ilam who had forsaken his erring ways, and by those, who, putting off their former garments, symbols of their delusion, had adorned their bodies with the lustre of the sacred ash, the lordly Vadavurar, dispenser of unalloyed divine grace, went to pay homage to Lord Siva, who dwells in the Golden Hall, set with beautiful gems.

Those Buddhists who, in their error and confusion had formerly held that liberation was merely total annihilation, now, casting their eyes upon the Golden Hall, lovingly prostrated themselves in worship, and were transformed into Saiva devotees of the highest attainment. What need is there to explain the matter further? Those who thus approached the hallowed precincts of Chidambaram, were they not like the cool floods of many rivers, that unite and merge together in the ocean?

When everyone had left the Golden Hall and departed, that eminent son of Vadavur went to pay homage to the noble feet of the Tiger-footed One, and then seated himself in those hallowed precincts. All the good citizens of Chidambaram beseeched him saying: ‘Master, may you henceforth remain here always!’ before going off to their houses.

The king of the land where the Kaviri river flows, the monarch who ruled over the land of Ilam, and the converts who had paid homage to the Golden Hall, adorning themselves with sacred ash so that the lasting effects of their evil deeds, accumulated in former births, were completely eradicated – all those bowed down in worship before the lordly Vadavurar, in whom the true knowledge of Lord Siva was fully mature. Then, departing from there, they joyfully returned to their stately halls and palaces that glittered with the lustre of precious gems.
Along with their king, those who had put off their wretched Buddhist robes and adorned themselves with holy ash, paid homage first to the glorious feet of the venerable sage Vadavurar before going to worship the Lord of the Golden Hall, where goodness and beauty reign. As the violence of their evil tendencies subsided, their hearts were suffused with joy, and they dwelt there in the city of Chidambaram as if it were their eternal home.
